Department of Ethnic Studies

Department Mission and Description

Ethnic Studies is the study of the histories, experiences, cultures, and issues of racial ethnic groups in the United States. The Ethnic Studies discipline emphasizes the social and historical study of race and racism in the United States, and it is defined by its attention to the systemic power relations that arise from institutional, cultural, and societal, contextually imposed or chosen meanings and interpretations of "race." While the focus is on the experiences of racialized peoples in the United States, the department also understands that race and racism are not unique or exclusive to the United States and can be juxtaposed with academic parallels made beyond geopolitical borders.

The department faculty are committed to intellectually rigorous teaching, scholarly activity that is programmatic and consequential to the field, and inclusive and supportive activism and service. From an intersectional and interdisciplinary approach, Ethnic Studies advances, challenges, and examines the social dynamics of race, racism, structural violence, settler colonialism, legalized discrimination, gendered violence, assimilation, and the resulting influences and impacts of such processes in the pursuit of human freedom and social justice.

Moreover, Ethnic Studies provides an in-depth understanding of racial-ethnic diversity, Indigenous and liberationist epistemologies, community and identity formation, education, artistic productions, and activism on the social, legal, cultural, and/or public policy front(s). Ultimately, Ethnic Studies seeks to generate thriving communities grounded in radical love, coalitional solidarities, and co-created knowledge.

Department of Human Development and Child, Adolescent, and Family Studies

Mission Statement

The Human Development, and Child, Adolescent, and Family Studies (HD-CAFS) department offers learners specialized knowledge that enhances their skills and abilities to work and advocate in partnerships that foster healthy children, supportive family networks, and interactive community relationships. A social constructivist approach to learning is reinforced in the academic activities that result in superior educational preparation for teachers, parents, and community professionals. The mission of the program is to develop well prepared, highly skilled individuals who can envision, interact, and respond to the needs of diverse populations within the local, regional, national, and global community.

CAFS Courses with Community Outreach

The Department of Human Development, and Child, Adolescent, and Family Studies (HD-CAFS) is continuing to work to support low-income children and families within our community. As part of our ongoing initiatives the HD-CAFS department was awarded a Jumpstart Grant in 2020-2021. This grant funded Educational Awards for HD-CAFS students to serve as Americorp Members in local preschools, by assisting teachers with individualized literacy instruction to help prepare children for educational success. The Department will continue to apply for Jumpstart Grant funding to maintain this program and provide opportunities for our students to acquire, develop and refine their teaching skills. Courses aligned with Community Outreach and/or Service Learning are integrated into all CAFS courses to develop and maintain our commitment and engagement to the local community we serve.
